Justice for the victims of the Parachute Regiment

Britain's Prince Charles is due in Dublin on Wednesday, 31st May. Dublin Against Royal Tour (DART) is opposing his visit because:

- Prince Charles is Colonel-in-Chief of 6 British army regiments, including the notorious Parachute Regiment, which is still present in the North of Ireland.

- The Paras have killed 45 Irish people in the North of Ireland over the past 25 years, including the Bloody Sunday victims in Derry.

- The prince is supporting a campaign to free Lee Clegg, a Para soldier convicted of the murder of teenager Karen Reilly, in 1990. He cannot therefore be said to be "above politics".

In South Africa, part of the peace process involved former President De Klerk publicly apologising for the evil and injustice of apartheid. If Britain's Prince Charles wants to support the Irish peace process he should apologise to the relatives of those shot on Bloody Sunday and the other victims of the Parachute Regiment.

Irish people normally give a welcome to all visitors but the royal visitor is not coming here as a tourist. His visit is designed to distract from the British government's continuing negative attitude to the peace process, and as such it should be opposed.
